

PRODUCTION ANALYSIS OF FIVE FILMS

(Composition, Blocking, Continuity)

"Two"(1964) by Satyajit Ray

Composition: In this the director focuses on the character's surroundings to establish the tone, understanding of the character's background and to give the idea of the character's behaviour. Like in image 1- the director establishes the character's financial background by showing a big room and lot of toys.

Blocking: In this, the director emphasizes on positioning and movement within the frame as shown in Image 2, the wealthy boy displays contemporary, Western toys such as air pistols, a robot, and ostentatious devices. In the meantime, the miserable boy responds using handcrafted, conventional items such as a kite, a drum, and basic musical instruments. In what amounts to a wordless duel, each youngster reacts to the other's action, and Ray uses their toys to further develop his characters. Their separation is further reinforced by the activity within and outside the house, and the window serves as a metaphorical boundary between two worlds.

Continuity: In this, Ray maintains continuity with precision. The back-and-forth structure of shots reflects the rivalry; one child presents something, and the other immediately responds. POV shots through the window strengthen the connection. Master shots inside the house create a sense of isolation, while wide shots outside symbolize freedom. Even small details, like the chewing gum stuck on the robot's head, stay consistent and show Ray's careful attention. The music also contributes to continuity. It is playful and almost childlike. It connects the contrasting visuals and maintains the tone of innocence mixed with jealousy.

"Tess Maar Khan"(2010) by Farah Khan

Composition: The framing is often excessive, filled with bright colours and exaggerated set designs. Instead of improving the comedy or heist theme, the visuals come across as cartoonish. The shots fail to create tension or meaning, making the comedy feel staged rather than clever.

Blocking: Actors frequently overact in the center of the frame, with little attention paid to meaningful movement or interaction with props. Akshay Kumar's character constantly strikes "hero" poses, but it seems forced. Supporting characters stand around as if they are just fillers. The blocking gives the film a stage play feel instead of a cinematic one, lacking depth or dynamic flow.

Continuity: The editing is careless. Comic timing suffers because cuts either happen too early or too late, ruining the punchlines. Visual continuity is often overlooked; props appear and disappear, characters shift positions between cuts (such as in The Train Robbery scene), and even action sequences lose their rhythm. This lack of attention to continuity makes the film feel amateurish despite its big budget.

"Ghost Town"(2008) by David Koepp

Composition: In the beginning, Pincus is often shown alone in the frame, surrounded by empty space. This makes him appear detached from the world. His office and home look dull and lifeless, reflecting his cold personality. As the story progresses, the composition changes. He's more frequently shown with Gwen or the ghosts, and the shots feel warmer and more balanced. This shift in composition illustrates how he gradually opens up to people.

Blocking: At first, Pincus often stands apart from others, or even faces away from them, highlighting his avoidance of connection. Later, as he grows closer to Gwen and the blocking changes, they are positioned closer together, sometimes leaning toward each other. This visually conveys their bond without needing words. When he interacts with Frank the ghost, the blocking usually places them side by side, demonstrating that Pincus cannot escape him and must engage.

Continuity: The film employs smooth editing, making the story easy to follow. Conversations mostly use simple shot reverse shot or over-the-shoulder techniques, keeping the rhythm light and natural. Even when the ghosts appear, the cuts remain clear, so you always know who Pincus is talking to. This keeps the comedy flowing and makes the emotional moments believable.

"Creature 3D"(2014) by Vikram Bhatt

Composition: The film's visuals failed to create fear. Most shots were either too bright, too flat, or poorly framed. Because of this, the horror atmosphere was lacking. The CGI creature appeared in wide, clear shots instead of being hidden in shadows. This approach destroyed any sense of mystery or tension.

Blocking: The placement and movement of characters felt forced. Actors would just stand around screaming instead of responding naturally to danger. The creature often appeared in random places that didn't line up with the characters' eyelines. This made the scenes look fake instead of frightening.

Continuity: Continuity errors made the film even weaker. In some chase sequences, the creature's size and position kept changing between shots, and props like weapons or furniture would shift suddenly. Even the creature's wounds and effects didn't stay consistent, breaking immersion completely.

"MISS PEREGRINE'S HOME FOR PECULIAR CHILDREN"(2016) by Tim Burton

Composition: Tim Burton's reputation for eye-catching visuals takes a hit in this film where the scenes often appear messy and lack consistency. Rather than framing shots to showcase the unusual abilities of the children many images hide them among chaotic backdrops or excessive computer-generated effects. This approach weakens the emotional impact of their powers causing the visual elements to confuse viewers instead of creating a sense of wonder.

Blocking: The way characters moved and were positioned on screen posed a challenge. During important action scenes, the kids appeared scattered in the frame failing to engage with their surroundings or each other. Even Miss Peregrine, the main character often stood rather than directing the scene's flow. This caused impactful or tense moments to fall short.

Continuity: The movie also has problems with consistency. The time loop rules and power mechanics lack coherence, with abilities highlighted at times and vanishing when the story needs them to. This leaves many storylines unexplored leading to a lot of confusion. Even the visual aspects fall short, as fight scenes jump between unmatched positions of people and creatures breaking the viewer's engagement.
